Studying Journalism in China

News exists in our daily life, we are very familiar with it. Journalism has been around for a long time and is quite knowledgeable. I chose to study journalism after entering the university because of my major is. Since then I have systematically studied theoretical knowledge in journalism and communication theory, etc. As the development of network technology, I prefer to study journalism that is more network-oriented. The school offers a lot of courses on network technology, such as website design and development, video editing and special effects production, news publishing&edit and so on. And then I learned to use some useful software, like Adobe InDesign, Premiere, Photoshop etc.

The development and practice of news in China is become more special and interesting. The Internet makes everyone who can reach it a citizen journalist, and many mobile applications born on the Internet, such as Weibo, WeChat, and Douyin, make the form of news more interesting. In addition, the emerging industries derived from them have greatly exerted their charm and greatly affected our lives and lifestyles. The rise of the domestic self-media industry and the popularity of short videos have allowed me to see the direction of my career and strengthen my choice. It is also an inspiration for future career planning.

During my undergraduate studies, how to apply what I have learned into practice is a question I have been thinking about. I am not satisfied with the content of the courses arranged by the school. I also participated in some courses organized by the school in cooperation with outside companies. For example, in 2016, the school and Sina Tianjin cooperated to launch an initial operation training course for the We Dream Workshop for one month. Then

I learned how to actually operate and operate a public account. Later, I tried to apply for a WeChat public account, and push regularly the activities and learning information of our department. Through two years of operation, I also achieved initial results and became a WeChat public account with more than 300 fans. During the summer vacation, I also applied for an internship at a local newspaper to experience how traditional paper media do news. At the beginning, the editorial director of the newspaper would let me read a lot of their previous newspaper content and participate in daily proofreading work, and then slowly took me out of the interview to explain the typographical rules and techniques of the newspaper. Finally, I could participate in a full report of the news. I have gained a lot of feelings and work experience that I have never had before. After that, I participated in the school newspaper editing work, and began to learn to use the Adobe Indesign software from the class for practical work. I completed a total of 12 editions of school newspaper typesetting. These practices have gradually made me like this form of journalism.

After just four years of study in university, I started to like journalism sincerely. I also know that what I have learned is not enough. I still stay at a superficial level and I expect to get more professional studies, so I prefer to become a graduate student. I was admitted to a school in Beijing and started my graduate life. By chance, after entering school, I was able to work in the school's history museum after class, and then was responsible for planning and editing a school's WeChat public account. I tried to make a WeChat push with tens thousands of readings, which made me encouraged. I started to find that I had great interest and experience in the operation of WeChat public account. After that I applied for the position of intern editor of CNR(www.cnr.cn) and started to participate in the operation of a WeChat official account named healthcnr with more than 300,000 followers. Here I learned how to make meaningful topic selection and title, and quickly collected and organized it into a qualified Content push, which greatly exercised my ability to select and reintegrate a large amount of information. This made me more experienced in this kind of work. WeChat pushes are the normal in China, with a wide audience, loyal fans, timely interaction with users, and timely news releases. These experiences have further deepened my understanding of journalistic practice. I was also exposed to data journalism during my postgraduate studies. It is also very knowledgeable. It is a new form of journalism. Using data to tell news, it also integrates the big data era we are in and uses the advantages of big data to discover. Use the advantages of big data to discover news and explore its relevance and significance.

2020 is destined to be an extraordinary year. All around the world are going through hardships, the global spread of the Novel coronavirus pneumonia, and data journalism also becoming widely known. Many media organizations and Internet platforms in China have also produced many news works about epidemic situation. Updated data in real time to help everyone understand the situation of the epidemic and provided a lot of convenience, it received widespread praise. These are all things that I started to learn about journalism. After I learned about journalism, what I saw and felt, it is a treasure waiting for me to continue to explore. I am happy to learn more about journalism from practice.
